

Nokia case study

Nokia Corporation (OMX: NOK1V, NYSE: NOK, FWB: NOA3) is the world's largest manufacturer of mobile telephones. The corporation also produces telecommunications network for a diversity of platforms.

Case specifics:

Background

Nokia faced a great launch period with up to 6 new websites worldwide per week. They needed help with strategic search marketing on how to best build each countries site with search in mind. The task was to optimise each web site for search engines to find and rank them and also to direct searchers to the correct site without conflicting with each other. Nokia has one technological platform that serves all their local websites and webmasters around the world.

Challenge

Nokia is a global company with a decentralised organisation that communicates locally. This creates a great challenge to coordinate the different markets without competing with each other. Maybe the searcher is looking for a business solution instead of a handset; do you direct them to the business pages? On what market? This is a difficult task, if you let each market have their way then you will run into image problems. If you manage it centrally you will loose the local touch. These were the problems Relevant Traffic was to find solutions for.

Krister Karjalainen, Digital Marketing Manager, Nokia, Strategic Marketing, - We made a strategic decision to work with search marketing experts and wanted Relevant Traffic's consultants in as early in the process as possible so when going live the sites would be strategically optimised and ready to go. The work Relevant Traffic's consultants put in before we went live have been crucial to us.

Solution

Relevant Traffic's consultants made an in-depth study of Nokia's complex network and then strategically mapped out technological functions and content with search in mind. The key point was to make Nokia's country specific websites get a strong presence in a natural as well as in sponsored links search. Relevant Traffic set up a central competence centre that is constantly updating the CMS tool and acts as a support with creating guidelines and implementing changes to keep all websites looking and behaving the same.

Result/Outcome

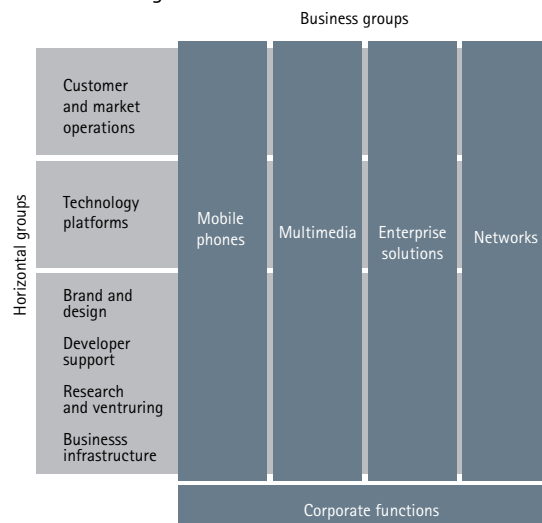

Nokia has now integrated a local search marketing structure into their overall global marketing strategy, and all Nokia's online websites are optimised accordingly.
